... a worldwide phenomenon. Rao was a student in the US when he first came across Ingress. Niantic Labs was still a part of Google at this point, and Ingress had a pretty big fan following among tech-enthusiasts. The background story was a bit of a sci-fi B-movie, but that hardly mattered compared to the emergent story that played out in the real world, as factions fought for control over landmarks. The problem with Ingress, according to Rao, is that it's all about the journey, with little thought given to the destination. "You'd travel for several kilometres to do anything, but then once you reached you'd have to hack a location or something like that and it takes only 10 seconds of very basic gameplay," says Rao. "There was just too much travel, and not enough gameplay. So I wanted to make something like Ingress, but with more strategic gameplay." The result is a
